Let's get started

NEW IN THE STUDIO

Kevin grinding the torus

A torus nears completion

Kevin is close to completing the solid-skinned torus he has been working on for several months. "I finally have added all the panels," he says. Each of the 63 panels was individually cut and fitted in this one-sided, three-dimensional sculpture (above). "Next is the finish work, then the patina."

Like After Escher, Mobilus, Skeletorus and Sprung, this geometric shape flows endlessly. See more photos of this as-yet-untitled sculpture on its own page.

The road goes on and on ...

To complement Cruisin', the sculptural door he created for a Flagstaff, Arizona, couple, Kevin has begun a new commission: two low fences that he calls On the Road Again.

The fences continue the roads introduced in the original piece. "Their flowing lines suggest roads beyond roads," Kevin says. The piece will have a rust patina.

Mill and lathe education continue

While he works on these sculptures in the studio, Kevin is also taking time to learn to use the lathe and mill. "In addition to reading, researching online and talking to experts, I have to just use the equipment to get a feel for each tool," Kevin observes.

He spends three to six hours a week learning their intricacies and capabilities. "As I do, ideas for sculptures are starting to form," he says.

UPCOMING EVENTS

Step back in time at historic hotel

As fall graces the Valley of the Sun, Kevin will share his art at the historic Hermosa Inn as part of LON's Artist-in-Residence series. Kevin is appearing Sunday, October 16.

The event takes place on the patio of LON's restaurant from 10 a.m. - 2 p.m., so mark your calendar now.

Once the home of artist Lon Megargee, the Hermosa Inn is a handsome example of gracious Southwestern architecture. "It's one of our favorite places to take visitors for dining," Kevin says.

For more information, please visit the Hermosa Inn Web site.

Be a part of the magic

Pearson & Company's cool oasis on Scottsdale's Main Street marks its 20th anniversary this year, and you're invited to the celebration.

Mark your calendar now for Magic on Main. The show opens on Thursday, October 20, from 7 - 9 p.m., and there's an encore on Saturday, October 22, from 10 a.m. - noon. The show celebrates Pearson & Company's 20 years on Scottsdale's gallery row.

In addition to Kevin's sculpture, musical guest and YouTube phenomenon Obadiah Parker will be playing. The paintings of Susan Osborne and jewelry of Azealea Decor will also be featured.

It all benefits the Southwest Autism Research & Resource Center, which advances research and provides a lifetime of support for individuals with autism and their families.
